Racism in football

The issue of racism in football has not gone away, despite the UK being a multicultural society. In 2011, two top Premier League footballers were alleged to have used racist abuse against opponents during matches and were investigated by football authorities. Perhaps a sign that the problem is not being treated seriously enough by global football authorities is that the head of global football said that racism on the pitch could be dealt with by a shake of the hand at the end of the game. He has since apologised for his remarks. Also, the Bulgarian Football Union was fined €40 000 for the racist chanting of some fans when Bulgaria played England in a European tournament qualifying match.

Your answers should refer to the passage as appropriate, but you should also include other relevant information.

Innocent man wins civil case

A man who was arrested by police, but later released without charge, has won a civil law case against a number of national newspapers. After the man was arrested for murder, but never put on trial or even charged, the newspapers published stories about the man which were inaccurate and insulting, and damaged his reputation. The man brought a case of libel against the newspapers and won his case at the High Court in London.

The High Court, despite its name, is not the highest court in the UK: that is the Supreme Court.

Your answers should refer to the passage as appropriate, but you should also include other relevant information.
