More than 150 countries in Asia, Africa, the Middle East and South America are thought of as developing countries. They differ a lot in terms of culture, religion, geography, economic activity and types of government. However, they do share some important characteristics which make us think of them as developing countries. Some define developing countries as those which mainly have a low living standard, high population growth, low income per person, and general economic and technological dependence on bigger world economies.

Attempts to define the term 'developing countries' are complicated. China is a major example. China is a developing country if we look at the income of ordinary people, but it has the power and influence of a strong world economy.

Israel, on the other hand, is a very small country in the Middle East but it is most certainly not a developing one.
