Source A Adapted from a speech given before the UN General Assembly by the Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev, 23 September 1960

The Soviet Union considers that if a correct approach is taken to the use of international armed forces, they may be useful. The experience of the Congo puts us on our guard. The Secretary-General, Mr Hammarskjold, is following a colonialist line, opposing the lawful government of the Congo and supporting the rebels. Under the guise of fighting for the independence of the republic of the Congo, the rebels are continuing the policy of colonialists. International armed forces are being used to suppress liberation movements. Provision must be made to ensure that no state falls into the predicament in which the Congo now finds itself.

Source B Until the closing days of the Cold War the UN's record of preventing and settling conflicts attested to the barriers to success that then existed. Only about two out of five of the UN's attempts to mediate conflicts succeeded. Similarly, of the 319 international disputes in which some fighting occurred between 1945 and 1984, only 137 were referred to the UN. Moreover, the UN failed to control nearly half of these disputes and failed to fully settle nearly 75 percent of them. The UN's peace-making achievements during the Cold War were modest at best.

- Source C Throughout the 1960s, new observer and peacekeeping operations, based on the ideas which emerged at the time of Suez, continued to be established in various parts of the world. These operations were designed to meet crises on the edge of superpower interests. That is to say, these were problems marginal to the
 - 5 ideological and geographical balance of the Cold War. These problems were not in the same category as Berlin, Hungary or Cuba. In these areas of core interest, the superpowers reserved the right to pursue their own interests unhindered by any multilateral interference such as by the UN. UN involvement was acceptable and desirable to the superpowers where, as in the Congo, Cold War alignments were present but not developed or significant.
