The number of marks is given in brackets [] at the end of each question or part question.

This document consists of 28 printed pages.

Section A: Research Methods

- 1 When sociologists study a subject they have to gather data. This data will either be primary or secondary. Primary data is that which sociologists gather at first hand for their own purpose and will be designed with their research in mind.

Secondary data already exists and so the researcher does not have to spend the time, or incur the expense, of gathering the information. Secondary data can be found in many different forms, including official statistics and personal documents.

Primary data enables the researcher to gather information that relates directly to the hypothesis they have developed. However, researchers have to be careful that their work is not subjective, as subjectivity can influence the validity of the data collected.
