Question 5

Fifteen-year-old Raylene Booker was a promising young soccer player in a Saturday morning district soccer competition. In last Saturday's semifinals, when trying to tackle an opponent, Raylene broke her leg in three places. The doctors have said she will never play again. Raylene's parents, already upset with the injury, were unhappy with the coach's explanation of the incident and decided to find out exactly what happened.

They discovered that before the game Raylene had told the coach that she did not feel well and did not want to play. The coach reminded Raylene of the game's importance and urged her to play anyway and to 'just do her best'. When Raylene's team was warming up, several players noted deep ruts in the field. Concerned about the danger of injury, the players informed the coach. The coach told them to try to avoid the holes and he failed to raise the problem with the game referee.

Midway through the first half, the accident occurred. Attempting a tackle, Raylene's foot got caught in a rut and a much larger opponent fell onto her fixed leg. Everyone heard a terrible crack. The coach decided not to wait for an ambulance but rushed Raylene in his own car to hospital about five kilometres away from the ground. Raylene was in terrible pain when the players carried her over to the coach's car. The ruts were left in the field following 'improvement work' that was undertaken during the week by the local council, after a request from the club. The soccer club leases the ground from the council.
